NOVEMBER, 1889. A BELATED REVENGE. Mr. Poe s narrative is supposed to have been written about 1810, at Lexington, Kentucky. The events it records were of date long previous: the scene opens in that part of Albemarle which is now Nelson County, Virginia. Several of his chapters are here abridged or suppressed, and only so much retained as seems essential to the unity of his story. Such experiences were perhaps less uncommon on the frontier than we would like to think them.--F. M. JB. PART KIRST. I. THE SHAWNEE PASS, Though the Beaver s Pass was within five miles of my father s house, no one in the neighborhood knew of it but myself and he from whom I had the secret. It was difficult either to find or mount, being no more than a series of cracks and ledges in the precipice, to be scaled only by rough climbing; but it afforded a way, such as it was, across the Ridge, much nearer than the gap by which my brothers used to ride to the over-hill country. At its foot was a sort of wigwam made of brushwood piled against the rock, --a mean shelter and a wretched habitation; but since those days I have often been content with worse. The Beaver, who called this hut his home, was a poor old vagabond, lame and worthless, who had long before disowned his tribe or been abandoned...
