In late 2011, after a year of extended internal deliberations, the Japanese government decided to explore the possibility of joining the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) negotiations. The TPP would be a free trade agreement (FTA) among at least 11 countries—Australia, Brunei, Canada, Chile, Malaysia, Mexico, New Zealand, Peru, Singapore, the United States, and Vietnam. The United States and its TPP partners envision the agreement as a comprehensive, next-generation regional agreement that liberalizes trade and investment and addresses new and traditional trade issues and 21st century challenges. Congress has a direct and oversight role in the issue of U. S. participation in the TPP. It must approve implementing legislation, if the TPP is to apply to the United States. Some Members of Congress have already weighed in on whether Japan should be allowed to participate in the TPP and under what conditions. More may do so as the process proceeds. Although Japanese leaders have not made a final decision yet on the TPP, they have been engaging in discussions with each of nine TPP partners separate from the main TPP negotiations. (Canada and Mexico have not officially joined the discussions.) At this writing, Japan has completed discussions with six of the countries, all of which support Japans participation and all of which already have been or are in the process of negotiating bilateral FTAs with Japan. Discussions with the United States, Australia, and New Zealand continue. The Obama Administration has identified three issues that Japan needs to address as confidence building measures if the United States is to support Japans entry into the TPP: Japanese restrictions on imports of U. S. beef; market access in Japan for cars made by the Detroit-based...
